

Having Tough Conversations- LICDP is here for you.

Divorces come in all different shapes and sizes. Some couples are in agreement that their marriage has reached a point of dissolution whereas for others, the desire for divorce might not be shared by both parties.

Having the "divorce talk" with your spouse, more often than not, is emotional, anxiety-provoking, and downright uncomfortable.

One of our esteemed Family Support Specialists, Alyse Parise, LCSW, has put together some tips on how to have this discussion with your spouse. Alyse has years of experience helping couples navigate the world of divorce and her compassionate spirit can help you navigate it too.

Getting divorced in today's world is much more complex than it was years ago- things cost more, it is more commonplace that young people attend college, and college tuition is no exception to the overall increase in costs.

Nannette Watts, CPA, has worked tirelessly to help couples divorce while planning for future financial events in their own lives, as well as their children's lives. Nannette knows exactly what questions to ask to make your financial planning surrounding your children's college education much more comprehensive and will make you feel at ease in both the short and long term.

Would you ever be comfortable allowing a complete stranger to determine your future? That is essentially the outcome when divorces are litigated. The judge, a stranger, makes the decisions and those decisions are final.

Collaborative Divorce gives YOU power over all of the decision making. Hear from LICDP's Attorney David Flier as he discusses co-parenting after divorce and how the flexibility of the Collaborative Model truly works for the family unit moving forward.
